

New user profiles let you contact other users, track changes, see your contributions and more...

We wanted to reward you for contributing to Designing Buildings Wiki, so we've made some big changes to user profiles.

As a registered user, you now get a 'page about me' where you can tell the world who you are, what you do and where you can be found. You can also let people email you (without revealing your email address) and you can keep track of all the contributions you've made to Designing Buildings Wiki.

To create your page about me, just log in and click 'EDIT MY PROFILE' at the top of the page.

Once you have a profile you can add a link to it in your articles by clicking the 'insert signature' button. Then people who read your articles will be able to find out about you too.

A screenshot of a user profile page on Designing Buildings Wiki. The page has a dark grey background. At the top, there are three labels: 'web link', 'profile image', and '140 characters that sum you up'. The 'web link' label points to a red circle around the URL 'http://www.gregorharvie.com'. The 'profile image' label points to a red circle around a photo of a man in a blue jacket. The '140 characters that sum you up' label points to a red circle around the text 'Architect and project management consultant'. Below the profile information is a paragraph of text about Dr. Gregor Harvie. At the bottom, there are two buttons: 'Email this User' and 'User contributions', both circled in red. At the very bottom of the screenshot, there are two more labels: 'let people contact you' and 'all your contributions'.
