THE SUNDAY TIMES APRIL 10 1966

A sidings Think-belt for 20,000 students

By Hugo Young, Social Services Correspondent

RAILWAY sidings, disused coal-mines, and a campus measuring twelve miles by nine are the main features of the latest, and surely most original, response to the country's need for more higher education. This academic nirvana, planned to the last piece of rolling-stock, is ready to be thrust upon the unsuspecting citizens of North Staffordshire under a suitably futuristic title: The Potteries Think-Belt.

In the Think-Belt there would be no grants, only salaries. There would be no Halls of Residence on grassy hillsides, but local authority housing, of revolutionary design, overlooking coal-tips and shared, democratically between students and local citizens.

The four varieties of house envisaged would be called, with aggressive disrespect for conventional primness, Sprawl, Battery, Capsule and Crate. Some would provide 100 per cent artificially controlled living, with no windows and no fresh air.

Instead of monumental lecture-halls, there would be mobile seminar units in railway trucks, operating from custom-built sidings, among which the units, not to mention the self-teach mobile carrels, could be shunted at will. Laboratories for the mere simulation of scientific truth would be out. Real factories, producing real contributions to the white-hot technological revolution, would be in.

The instigator of this vision is architect Cedric Price, a Potteries man whose other ventures include the projected Fun Palace for South London. Price has surveyed the entire area, selected 33 sites for development, which would involve no demolition, and made detailed drawings of buildings, sidings and mobile units. The Belt would take seven years to construct, and cost about £80 million. Three Government departments have asked for the plans.

Price believes that the present new universities are too small, too exclusive, too detached from society, and too attached to the medieval origins of the system. Architecture, he insists, must increase the range of choice, not settling on some ultimate good—an ideal which the Think-Belt would doubtless fulfil.

Mobility and impermanence would be the motto. Even the three massive "transfer areas," the static teaching centres, would be built for flexibility. There would be room for 20,000 students, located between the outer points at Meir, Madeley and Pitts Hill, which enclose all of Arnold Bennett's five towns. They would catch the railbus every day to the appropriate siding, or the railbus might come to them and stay for the length of a seminar.
